

Course of Instruction in Operative Surgery in the University of Manchester, Vol. 9 (Classic Reprint)

Operative Surgery. INTRODUCTION. The organisation of a course of instruction in operative surgery on the dead body has been found to present considerable difficulties, of which the most important are the impossibility of accurately reproducing the conditions under which we operate upon the living, and the necessity for economising time and material. In order to reduce such a course to reasonable limits we have then, first, to consider what is to be aimed at and how far any operations upon the cadaver can be of real value to the student. We may admit at once that under no circumstances can such operations realise accurately the conditions of clinical surgery, and that unless great care be taken the results may be not only artificial, but actually misleading.
