Not illustrated. 1888 Excerpt: ...in the distal end of the canal. It is common to find the free end of the appendix greatly enlarged and distended from this cause. Moreover, the tube when acutely bent upon itself may be found ulcerated at the seat of flexion, and it is easy to understand that that ulceration may lead to a more widely-spread inflammation. In the majority of cases the vermiform process lies behind the end of the 1 Matterstock, loc. cit. With, loc. cit. ileum, pointing towards the spleen, but from disease or from simple anatomical changes in its mesentery it may be found lying in all possible positions. Its posture with reference to the general cavity of the abdomen is, of course, mainly dependent upon the mobility of the caecum. With remarkable frequency the appendix is found to have contracted adhesions to neighbouring points of the peritoneum, a condition that may lead to other and more serious troubles than typhlitis. These are some of the anatomical conditions in the appendix that may lead to typhlitis, but a still commoner cause of the trouble remains. The muscular coat of this little tube is very feebly developed, and this circumstance, combined with its position and its arrangement as a culde-sac, greatly favours the accumulation of matters in its lumen. These take the form occasionally of foreign bodies derived from the food, but more frequently consist of inspissated faeces. Fitz,¹ in his able monograph on the appendix, states that more than three fifths of all cases of perforated appendices are due to concretions and foreign substances lodged in the little canal. When the appendix does become inflamed, anatomical conditions assist in rendering that inflammation local. In 18 per cent. of all cases I found the process lodged behind the caecum; and, when in this postur...
