

Construction Management

A subject may be described in terms of what it is, or in terms of what it is not. Construction management, then, is that group of management functions by which construction is authorized, purchased, supervised, accomplished, inspected, and accepted. On the other hand, construction management is not the economic analysis by which the feasibility of the project is determined, nor is it the consideration of site characteristics, structural theory, properties of materials, process planning, or industrial management operations by which the basic design of the facility is developed. However, these considerations play important subsidiary roles in the successful execution of the construction project and in the continuing solvency of the construction organization.
