

Oracle: Book 3 of The Farseer Trilogy

Mother, the new awareness named her. Oracle. Daughter. Mine. Sibylla had known even as she lay exhausted and battered by the demands of nature that it was her daughter who spoke to her. This was no mere suggestion born of an overwrought mind; Oracle had come into the world already a Witch, with power flowing in her tiny veins. Sibylla had suspected that this might happen, but still found that dread crept through her as she looked into the white orbs of the tiny baby. When a sun-browned hand reached for her own, she remembered that Raven was with her, with both of them. It would be his task to protect the two of them. With every single drop of blood in my body, Raven swore, needing no words in order to understand the thoughts passing through Sibylla's tired mind. Silently, Sibylla told herself that she hoped that sacrifice upon this level would not be necessary. She was the Witch of Blood and Water, the Great Seer reborn. Raven was the last ever Bone Priest, the extent of his magic as yet unexplored. The arrival of their child had been anticipated by the Witches of the Blood, their large and unusual family, and all had been reminded of the power wielded by Oracle's parents. Despite their preparations, Sibylla knew that there would come a time when Raven would need to deliver upon the promise that he had just made her. She was a Farseer; the future could not hide from her.
