

Some Essentials in the Teaching of Music: For the Consideration of Music-Teachers, Music-Students and Parents (Classic Reprint)

Excerpt from Some Essentials in the Teaching of Music: For the Consideration of Music-Teachers, Music-Students and Parents It is doubtful whether there is any subject of instruction which is taught so carelessly, so ignorantly, so improperly, and by so many people who are by nature and by training unfit to teach, as music. Thousands of people who have learned to play or sing a little, barely enough to perform a few pieces more or less acceptably, consider this a sufficient qualification to teach music. It seems to them an easy way of earning a living and, while the State exacts the attainment of definite standards in Normal training in all other subjects, they know that no such standards are established in the teaching of music and that they can offer themselves to the public with impunity. The ignorance of the public makes it easy and safe to impose themselves as competent and, by dint of advertising, personal influence and acquaintance and by offering cheap service, they often manage to assemble large classes of pupils. But even the better trained musicians, equipped with ample musical and technical ability, frequently enter upon the career of teaching with an imperfect knowledge of true educational principles.
